STRANDING OF THE JULIA

Capt. Louis P. Pearsall

The schooner Julia, home port New York, with a crew of two men, father and son, bound from Haverstraw, N. Y. on the Hudson River, to East Rockaway, at 2:00 p.m. January 1, 1884 struck the outer edge of Hog Island Shoal. This was about two and-a-half miles westward of the Long Beach Life Saving Station. The vessel was carrying a cargo of brick. Thick fog caused her pilot to miss the channel leading into Hog Island Inlet.

The sea was very rough and a short time after the schooner struck she bilged and settled in the sand, with her rail under water. This caused the men to seek refuge in the rigging. As the vessel was about a mile from shore she was not seen by the Life Saving crew. Providentially, they were notified about a half hour after the grounding by a fisherman who saw her strike as he was returning through the inlet.

Once alerted, the Life Savers immediately launched their surfboat and after a hard row through the breakers, arrived at the scene about 4:00 o'clock. The Julia was by then completely submerged, with her decks gone and the starboard wales burst out, hanging by the rigging. It was only at great risk that the Life Savers approached the vessel as the shoal was covered by a maelstrom of breakers. In fact, on the first attempt to pull alongside they came so near to having their surfboat stove by the bouncing wreckage that they were compelled to back off.

Watching for a more favorite moment, the Keeper passed the word to give way at the oars, and skillfully guided the boat to the wreck from which he succeeded in rescuing the two men still clinging to the rigging. It was a narrow escape and a gallant rescue. The men, exhausted from cold and exposure, were taken to the Life Saving Station and in a couple of days were able to leave for their home in Glen Cove. Vessel and cargo were completely lost. The schooner, of 58 tons, under command of Master Dennis, had an estimated value of $600; cargo $75.

Schooners have long been a familiar sight in Long Island harbors, many of them freight boats well into this century.
